Dear clients,

There's been no shortage of headlines driving crypto markets in recent weeks, although the themes haven't necessarily changed over that time. For example, US politics continue to have a dizzying effect on crypto performance, as many market players parse the regulatory, fiscal and monetary policy implications of different electoral outcomes. With the margins in the US presidential race narrowing based on official polling data, this supports our outlook for a choppy 3Q24 before crypto prices stabilize and ultimately improve in 4Q24. One of the major events to watch in the next few days is Former President Donald Trump's speech at the Bitcoin 2024 Conference scheduled for July 27 at 2pm ET. Whether this materializes as a large BTC or crypto market catalyst still remains to be seen.

Flows have been more important than fundamentals for crypto performance in the short term. Spot ETH ETFs launched in the US on July 23 in a major milestone event with nine issuers including BlackRock, Fidelity and Franklin Templeton. By volume, these ETFs have performed in line with the upper range of expectations, with the first two trading days generating an average $1.1B in aggregate daily turnover. In our view, it's still too early to draw any firm conclusions about market participants' interest in spot ETH ETF products based on their performance in the first few days. Determining their ultimate success will require a longer term horizon, akin to what we saw with the US spot bitcoin ETFs in January.

Finally, we just published our latest Guide to Crypto Markets - Q3 2024, which provides a comprehensive view of the metrics and trends that matter most to institutional investors. We also recently released a report on the Measures of Adoption in the EVM which introduces the h-index and recipient dominance ratio metrics for analyzing onchain activity growth, comparing trends across EVM ecosystems.
