

Weekly Market Commentary

Dear clients,

Macro continues to remain in the driver's seat for crypto markets, absent major new idiosyncratic factors. Although a slightly softer-than-expected July US CPI print reinforced expectations of impending Fed cuts, inflation was precariously balanced against better economic activity data released this week. This makes it challenging for any market players still reassessing their appetite for risk following the sell-off earlier this month. We expect the Jackson Hole Economic Symposium on August 22-24 to be the next major event to test the pulse of markets.

Meanwhile, updated 2Q24 13-F filings for US spot bitcoin ETFs were released on August 14, revealing notable new holders like Goldman Sachs at $412M and Morgan Stanley at $188M. (Both may be holding shares on behalf of clients as part of their private banking and wealth management arms.) The ETF complex saw net inflows of $2.4B during this quarter, a growing portion of which appears to be driven by institutions, whose percentage of share ownership rose from 21.4% to 24%. Within the institutional sector, the "investment advisor" category is growing the fastest, which we think is likely to continue as more brokerage houses complete their due diligence on these funds.

Finally, we published our August Monthly Outlook where we reaffirm our market views for 2H24 and take a look at correlations between crypto and traditional assets. Notably, our empirical study suggests that it's likely the weak relationship between stocks and crypto should continue amid a disinflationary environment with lower interest rates. We also published a Market Intelligence report diving into the ramifications of an L2-centric roadmap on ETH fee spend. Our analysis shows that scaling more generally, rather than the L2-roadmap specifically, has been driving the reduction in ETH fees.
