Dear clients,

Both crypto and broader risk markets have held up relatively well despite President Trump following through on his threat of tariffs this week. In part, that reflects the reprieve negotiated with Canada and Mexico, though the escalation with China has added to general investor uncertainty and market volatility. It's as of yet unclear how the Federal Reserve might react to potential price pressures, as their decision is path dependent on whether importers absorb or pass on the costs as well as whether more tariffs could be coming in the future.

Meanwhile, over the past week, US-based spot ETH ETF inflows have more than doubled those of BTC vehicles at $409M vs $173M. We think these outsized ETH ETF flows may reflect opportunities in the CME basis trade alongside a potential divergence of sentiment between traditional financial players and crypto native ones. The basis on CME ETH futures has recently been higher than CME BTC basis, often viewed as a bullish positioning signal. But perpetual futures funding rates (available only on offshore exchanges) suggest a more bearish outlook, with ETH funding rates flipping negative.

Finally, we saw the launch of Uniswap V4 this week, which represented a major step forward for decentralized finance (DeFi) applications. The new version enables the programmatic extendability of decentralized exchange (DEX) pools via its "hook" architecture. It also lowers the cost to create a pool, enables more efficient routing in swaps, and supports native ETH. That said, we think the full benefits and adoption of V4 may take several months to fully materialize.
