Dear clients,

This was a slower week in both crypto and traditional risk markets, as players look ahead to the tariffs coming into effect on April 2. That said, market anxiety did pick up on March 27 after President Trump announced that he would impose a 25% tariff on all auto imports alongside the reciprocal tariffs on trading partners. Despite this, markets held in relatively well, though we think this was mostly due to short covering rather than fundamental trading activity. Spot and futures volumes for BTC, ETH and SOL across global centralized exchanges remain depressed, even though this is typically when we'd see the effects of month-end portfolio rebalancing add to liquidity.

Meanwhile, regulatory tailwinds for crypto in the US remain strong. President Trump underscored the focus on US dominance at the Digital Assets Summit, highlighting progress on stablecoin and market structure bills. The SEC hosted the first of five Crypto Task Force roundtables on March 21, discussing conditions for digital assets as securities—key for shaping a market structure bill. Further talks will run through June 2025, covering custody, tokenization, and DeFi. Additionally, the Senate passed a resolution repealing the IRS DeFi reporting rule, now awaiting President Trump's approval.

Finally, it was a big week for stablecoins. The House of Representatives released a draft of the STABLE Act on March 26, potentially setting new standards for stablecoin regulation, prohibiting yield payments to holders, imposing a two-year moratorium on new crypto collateralized stablecoins, and introducing reserve, transparency, and approval requirements for issuers. Meanwhile, stablecoin innovation is accelerating: World Liberty Financial plans to launch a treasury-backed stablecoin, Fidelity Investments is testing dollar-pegged stablecoins, and Wyoming's multichain WYST rollout points to long-term multichain tokenization.
