Dear clients,

It's rare to witness market inflection points in real time, as we only tend to recognize major regime shifts with the benefit of time and reflection. But the recent decoupling of bitcoin from traditional macro assets feels like a defining moment. Bitcoin has been outperforming US stocks on a risk-adjusted basis for weeks, a trend highlighted on April 17 when President Trump expressed frustration with Federal Reserve Chair Jerome Powell – sending equities nearly 2 standard deviations lower, while bitcoin held steady.

More striking is that this week bitcoin sharply appreciated against gold – which typically moves inversely with the US dollar and US Treasury yields – suggesting that the token may be charting its own course in global financial markets. While it's too early to declare a lasting trend amid volatile, headline-driven conditions such as the ongoing US-China tariff standoff, we think bitcoin's evolving return distribution increasingly mirrors gold more than riskier assets, hinting at its growing role in reshaping the financial landscape.

Finally, this week we published Charting Crypto: Q2 2025 (formerly Guide to Crypto Markets), our sixth quarterly report and the definitive resource for crypto investors to follow the market themes and metrics that matter most. Charting Crypto incorporates several new metrics, including a section that details our team's topline market views. In this edition, we highlight how long-term holders have responded to the market selloff, what's happening with correlations across crypto and traditional assets, how the current BTC and ETH cycles are shaping up, and much more.
