Dear clients,

Although the market responded positively to the US-UK trade deal, we think there's greater anticipation surrounding the US-China talks in Geneva this weekend, with the potential for tariff reductions fueling sentiment. The 90-day delay on tariffs announced on April 9 has added urgency for agreements, so a loss of momentum on this front can affect investor confidence across asset classes. Fortunately, the initial progress seems promising, particularly with respect to the trade barriers on semiconductors. This also explains the muted reactions to the Federal Reserve's FOMC meeting on May 7. The feedback from crypto has been upbeat with bitcoin's surge past $100k this week supported by spot ETF inflows, reflecting heightened institutional interest.

On the regulatory side, New Hampshire's passage of a Strategic Bitcoin Reserve law positions it as a trailblazer, with 19 other states considering similar legislation. Arizona saw mixed outcomes, as the governor vetoed a crypto pension fund bill but approved one on unclaimed digital assets. Meanwhile, the US Senate's rejection of the GENIUS Act (a stablecoin bill) had little impact on crypto prices. Coinbase remains at the forefront of innovation with its acquisition of Deribit and the much-anticipated launch of 24/7 BTC and ETH futures trading on May 9, marking another milestone in advancing institutional adoption and aligning US crypto markets with global standards.

Finally, we just launched our Bitcoin: Institutional Product Guide 2025 where we analyze the various products available to institutional investors by comparing their efficiency, size, costs and tradeoffs as well as examining the market dynamics shaping their adoption. In recent years, the crypto market has evolved significantly, with the investment strategies in this space becoming more and more sophisticated. For bitcoin specifically, institutional players can now gain exposure through spot, fixed-term futures, perpetual futures, options, exchange-traded products and equity proxies, among others.
