Three Themes for 2H25

Our Crypto Market Outlook Remains Constructive

View report

Our constructive outlook for crypto markets in 2H25 is driven by several key factors, including a more optimistic perspective on US economic growth, potential Federal Reserve rate cuts, increased crypto adoption by corporate treasuries and progress with respect to US regulatory clarity. While there are potential risks, such as a steepening US Treasury yield curve and potential forced selling pressure from publicly-traded crypto vehicles, we think these risks are manageable in the near term.

Three key themes stand out for crypto markets, in our view. First, macro prospects appear more favorable than previously expected. The specter of recession has diminished, and the US economy shows signs of stronger economic growth. While a slowdown remains possible, conditions are unlikely to cause asset prices to revert to 2024 levels. Second, crypto adoption by corporate treasuries is an important source of demand, albeit there are valid concerns about potential systemic risks in the medium-to-long term. Third, significant regulatory developments, particularly regarding stablecoins and crypto market structure legislation, are underway and could significantly shape the US crypto landscape.

Despite the risks, we think bitcoin's upward trend is expected to continue, though the prospect for altcoins may depend more on idiosyncratic factors. For example, the SEC is navigating numerous ETF applications, with potential decisions on in-kind creations and redemptions, staking inclusion, multi-asset funds and single-name altcoin ETFs – all expected before the end of 2025. The pending proposals and their related decisions could impact market dynamics.
