Dear clients,

The convergence of crypto and traditional finance (tradFi) seemed to reach a fever pitch this week, with institutional adoption taking center stage as the dominant narrative. More corporate entities reported engaging in crypto acquisitions, for example, while both US-based spot BTC and spot ETH ETFs attracted substantial net inflows in June. Meanwhile, following the nonfarm payrolls release yesterday, we think markets will likely pivot from monetary policy to fiscal policy drivers, with the signing of the One Big Beautiful Bill Act.

Equity tokenization moved from concept to reality last week as two platforms opened tokenized exposure to private, pre-IPO giants like OpenAI and SpaceX. These tokens are derivatives that track share prices, enable 24/5 trading, and do not confer ownership. For the first time, this allows retail investors to access pre-IPO valuations previously reserved for accredited investors and institutions. In a related note, the REX-Osprey Solana + Staking ETF debuted as the first US-listed vehicle offering both spot SOL exposure and native staking yield. Despite the costs, investor response underscored latent demand for yield-bearing crypto exchange traded products, with strong trading volume on its first day.

Finally, tech magnates launched a new bank, Erebor, to cater primarily to tech startups and crypto entrepreneurs, aiming to fill the void left by the collapse of Silicon Valley Bank. Erebor plans to focus on holding stablecoins and applied for a banking charter. Similarly, Circle Internet Group, Inc. and Ripple applied for national trust bank charters with the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), which would allow them to manage stablecoin reserve assets and offer custody solutions but not accept cash deposits or issue loans.
